

Government Documents

Publications of the federal, state, and local governments are housed in the library's Government Documents Collection. Government publications might include committee hearings, departmental reports, special studies commissioned by government departments or agencies, public laws, statutes, and other legal documents, statistics, and a whole host of other types of materials. Government publications should not be overlooked as potential research sources; they often may provide access to materials that can be found nowhere else and are often rich with statistical data. Congressional hearings, for example, often include testimony from expert witnesses that will help a researcher to identify names of leading researchers or experts in a particular field.

United States Documents

The United States Government is one of the most prolific publishers in the world. Its various agencies and departments publish a variety of materials, including citizen and consumer guides, compilations of statistics on nearly any aspect of American life, guides to foreign countries and foreign data, records of all public hearings of the Congress, and legal documents that record legislative histories and the legislative process in the United States. Much of the publishing has traditionally been handled through the United States Government Printing Office and has focused on traditional print publishing. As the volume of information has increased and citizen access to the Internet has also expanded, the government has moved heavily into also providing information via its various websites. For example, the Census Department provides a searchable database of information that it has gathered on the population of the United States and on U.S. industry and commercial activity. The Library of Congress maintains a massive website that not only provides access to historical materials that help to define the American experience but to a fully searchable system of legislative materials produced as a part of the Congress's routine business. The Library's Thomas website (thomas.loc.gov) provides access to Congressional hearings and reports going back many years.

As a part of its responsibility to keep the public informed of its activities, the federal government makes its publications available to libraries across the country through its Depository Library program. Some libraries serve as full depositories and receive all publications of the federal government while some libraries serve as selective depositories. The Thomas G. Carpenter Library is a selective depository and receives those publications of the federal government which fit its profile.

Superintendent of Documents Classification

U.S. documents housed in the Thomas G. Carpenter Library are cataloged according to the Superintendent of Documents Classification System or SuDocs. This system organizes materials by the issuing agency or department rather than by subject matter.

The Superintendent of Documents classification system was developed in the Library of the Government Printing Office between 1895 and 1903. It was first described in October 1903 by William Leander Post, then in charge of the Library, in the preface to List of Publications of the Agriculture Department 1862-1902, Department List No. 1, issued by the Superintendent of Documents in 1904. Mr. Post gives credit for the foundation of the system (classification by governmental author) to Miss Adelaide R. Hasse, who used government organization authorship to assign classification numbers to a List of Publications of the U.S. Department of Agriculture from 1841 to June 30, 1895. Miss Hasse prepared the list while assistant librarian in the Los Angeles Public Library. It was published by the Department of Agriculture in 1896 as its Library Bulletin No. 9. This system has expanded as the Federal Government has grown. Though still retaining the principles upon which it is based, it has changed in some details and methods of use. Because the classification system is based on the current organizational status of the government author, it changes as the organizational structure of the federal government changes. Thus, publications of some issuing agencies may be located in as many as three different places in the system.

Florida Documents

The state government of Florida is responsible for providing Floridians with a record of what government business is transacted by the various state departments and agencies and by the Florida Legislature. Much information is made available directly from the state's website, but the state also publishes reports, statistical information, and legislative hearings in print. The Thomas G. Carpenter Library receives many of the state's print publications, which are located in the documents collection in the library. Just as the federal government has a depository arrangement with libraries, the State of Florida has its own system, begun in 1968, known as the Florida State Depository System. The Thomas G. Carpenter Library is a full depository for State of Florida documents, receiving all printed publications of the state government. The State of Florida also publishes many materials directly on its websites. A good starting place for locating available information is MyFlorida.com.

City of Jacksonville Documents

The Thomas G. Carpenter Library also collects publications of the City of Jacksonville. These are housed as part of the Florida documents collection in the library and are designated with call letters beginning JAX.

Finding Documents in the Library

As with most other materials in the library, government publications can be searched using the library's catalog. There are a couple of different ways to limit a search to government publications.

Basic Search

The screenshot shows a library catalog search interface. At the top, it says "Catalog - books, ebooks, journals, movies and music, government documents, and more". Below this is a search bar with the text "Enter keywords describing the topic" and a search button. The search term "homelessness" is entered in the search bar. To the right of the search bar are links for "renewals/library account" and "end session".

Below the search bar, it says "Basic Search: homelessness" and "Anywhere" with a dropdown menu. There are also links for "Search", "Start Over", "Advanced Search", and "[help]".

Below the search bar, it says "Search: 'homelessness': We found 377 matching items." and "Click the Government Documents collection option".

Below the search results, there are several facets on the left side: "Library/Collection", "Format", and "Subject: Topic". The "Library/Collection" facet has a link for "Government Documents-2nd floor (30)". The "Format" facet has a link for "Govt Publication (107)".

The search results are displayed in a list. The first result is "Homelessness / by Sara Dixon Criswell." with a "book" icon. The second result is "Coping with homelessness [electronic resource] / Eugene Hurwitz and Sue Hurwitz." with a "book" and "online" icon.

Annotations with red arrows point to the search bar, the "Government Documents-2nd floor" link, and the "Govt Publication" link.

The basic search screen of the catalog allows a researcher to input keywords describing a topic and to review a listing of materials that are available in the library matching the keywords. To limit the results to only government publications, a researcher can use the facets that appear in the left panel of the search result screen. At the top of the facets is a listing of available results by "Library/Collection." Look in this facet for the Government Documents link and click it to limit the search results only to the documents collection. Selecting the Government Documents facet will also further categorize the search results into U.S. Documents, Florida Documents, and other documents locations, including CD and microformat collections. Another possible way to limit to documents is to select the format facet and choose to limit the search to just "government publications." Limiting to government publications does not necessarily mean that all the matching results will be in the 2nd floor documents collections. Some government publications might also end up being shelved in the library's main book collection on the 3rd or 4th floors or in Special Collections on the 1st floor. Further limits can be placed on the search by selecting other search result facets.

The advanced search screen also offers a couple of different ways to limit the search results to government publications. In addition to being able to input several different keywords or phrases to describe a search topic, a researcher is also able to choose to limit to "Location" and/or to "Format." The location limit includes an option for Government Documents, which, when selected, limits the search just to the library's documents collections (this includes U.S., Florida, and Jacksonville documents). Note: Limiting to a physical location in the library will exclude online government publications that are only available online.

The format option allows the researcher to limit the search result to "government publications." This will limit primarily to publications in the library's documents collection, but it might also retrieve books in the library's main book collection if they are published by a government entity or online documents that are not physically in any library collection.

Publications of the federal, state, and local governments can address all types of current and historical topics and provide researchers with a wealth of information. Researchers should not overlook the library's documents collections as a rich source of information for a variety of topics.
