Patricia Roberts Harris

The United States has boasted many high achievers, but Patricia Roberts Harris was truly a pioneer. She was the first African-American woman to be an ambassador, a presidential cabinet member, a member of a major corporation's board of directors, a chair of a national political party committee, and a member of the United Nations. She was also the first woman to be a law school dean.

One of Harris's most important "firsts" came at the 1964 Democratic National Convention. Asked to give the seconding address for Lyndon Johnson, Harris became the first African-American woman to have a role in a presidential nomination. In this address, she spoke of issues most dear to her: making the American dream available to disadvantaged people throughout the nation and ensuring that justice, prosperity, and peace reign nationally and internationally.

With this 33-cent stamp, the 23rd in the Black Heritage series, the U.S. Postal Service honors Harris. The stamp, which features a photograph of Harris taken in the late 1970s, was issued in Washington, DC, where Harris lived and worked for much of her life.

AMERICAN COMMEMORATIVES

Patricia Roberts Harris

In 1924, Patricia Roberts Harris was born to a Pullman dining car waiter and his wife in Mattoon, Illinois. By 1985, when she succumbed to cancer, Harris had amassed a lifetime of achievements; from her early years as an industrious student, to her mature life as a public servant committed to the rights of all Americans, especially members of minority groups.

Harris was a model student. She graduated summa cum laude from Howard University in 1945. In 1960, she graduated first in her class at George Washington University National Law Center. She taught law at Howard for several years and was the law school's first woman dean.

President Lyndon Johnson asked Patricia Harris to give the seconding address for his nomination at the 1964 Democratic National Convention. One year later, he appointed her ambassador to Luxembourg. Both honors were groundbreaking. Harris was the first African-American woman to participate in a presidential nomination or to be an ambassador.

In 1977, President Carter appointed Harris Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. Two years later he appointed her Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. Harris was the first African-American woman to serve on a presidential cabinet.

Like four other stamps in the Black Heritage series, this elegant 33-cent stamp features a photograph. David Valdez, a staff photographer at HUD, took the photograph in the late 1970s, while Harris was the HUD Secretary. Originally in color, the photograph has been reprinted in black and white on this 23rd stamp in the Black Heritage series. This stamp was issued on January 27, 2000, in Washington, DC.

Patricia Roberts Harris (1924-1985), who is honored on this U.S. stamp, was an outstanding role model for women. An admired public official and activist during the 1960s and 1970s, she championed the needs of the disadvantaged and advocated fairness and equality for all Americans.

Born in Mattoon, Illinois, Harris earned a scholarship to Howard University in Washington, D.C. She graduated summa cum laude a year ahead of schedule and began her career with the YMCA in Chicago. She later attended George Washington University Law School and graduated first in her class while working as the national executive director of Delta Sigma Theta sorority.

In 1961 Harris joined the faculty at Howard University and was appointed dean of its law school in 1969. Her academic career was interrupted in 1965, when President Lyndon Johnson named her U.S. ambassador to Luxembourg. She was the first African-American woman to hold an ambassadorial post.

Harris continued to be a "woman of firsts." She was the first African-American female Cabinet officer, serving under President Carter as both Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. She was also the first black woman to sit on the Board of Directors of major corporations such as IBM and Chase Manhattan Bank.
