International Flavor To Highlights in Jazz

"Jazz Is My Passport," presented by Highlights in Jazz, brought a multinational lineup of musicians to the Loeb Student Center at New York University on Thursday. Judging by the jam session-concert, American dominance of jazz is not in any danger.

The best moments came from horn players — notably the Argentine saxophonist-clarinetist Jorge Anders, whose floating tone and leisurely phrasing evoked Stan Getz — never wasting a note, spinning out easeful melodies. The trumpeters Valery Ponomarev, from the Soviet Union, and Claudio Roditi, from Brazil, both leaned toward be-bop. Mr. Ponomarev with a silvery tone and a nicely asymmetrical sense of space, and Mr. Roditi with displays of speed and fluency and a strong Dizzy Gillespie influence.

The vibraphonist Warren Chiasson supplied coolly swinging accompaniment, particularly in a ballad duet with Mr. Anders, and took center stage for a rippling solo piece, "Ultramarine."

The rhythm section for the jam sessions included the Danish pianist Niels Lan Doky, whose speedy right hand made for glib solos, along with the American bassist Bill Crow and the Swiss-Austrian drummer Joris Dudli.

The concert's centerpiece was a set by the Brazilian singer Astrud Gilberto, who helped set off the bossa-nova craze of the early 1960's. Back then, her breathy voice connoted sultry subtlety. But Thursday, with a band featuring her son Marcelo on electric bass, she sounded listless and insecure of pitch — perhaps the result of performing, as she said, with the flu.

GOING OUT Guide

SINGULAR EXPORT

Jazz music is one of the few uniquely American creations. As such, it has been exported for decades by personal appearances of musicians in foreign lands, by records, by radio broadcasts and now, by cassette and television. Jazz performances reaching foreign countries have created audiences that appreciate the art form and inspired those who would also create the music.

Among these are the singer Astrud Gilberto and the trumpeter Claudio Roditi from Brazil; the pianist Niels Lan Doky from Denmark; the trumpeter Valery Ponomarev from the Soviet Union; the vibraharpist Warren Chiasson from Canada, and Jorge Anders, the saxophonist and clarinetist, from Argentina. All of these musicians will be participating today in a Highlights in Jazz program, "Jazz Is My Passport."

The program starts at 8 P.M. in the New York University Loeb Student Center (598-2027) at 566 La Guardia Place. Admission is $8.50; students, $6.50.
